CCF Premier Says:

Anti-Labor Wave Sweeps Canada

REGINA (CP) — Premier T. C. Douglas told the Saskatchewan legislature Thursday a wave of anti-labor feeling seems to be sweeping across the country.

The legislature voted down a Social Crediter's motion asking that a legislative committee be appointed to investigate the operation of the Trade Union Act.

The vote was 40 to 3 with Liberals and CCF members combining to defeat the Socreds.

AMENDMENT LOST

Just previously, the chamber voted down 41 to 2 an amendment that the federal government be asked to appoint a royal commission to investigate trade union activity across Canada.

The premier said the proposed investigation was part of a pattern throughout North America. It had begun with the right-to-work legislation in the U.S. and continued through the Senate investigations which had unearthed "some racketeering."

Then in Newfoundland, Premier Joseph Smallwood's government had passed legislation allowing the cabinet to decertify a union chosen by the workers.

NOT SINCE 1871

"This hasn't happened in a British country since 1871," the premier declared.

He contended that all Mr. Smallwood had to do in the loggers' dispute was give notice it would appoint an arbitration board after a certain time.

In British Columbia, the government had brought in legislation to stop picketing in some cases and to make unions a legal entity.

Now the anti-labor movement was being expressed in a motion to investigate the Saskatchewan Trade Union Act.

High IQ Students No Cinch to Teach

A teacher who imparts mathematics to students of "superior intellect" works every bit as hard as one who handles a class of below-average youngsters, says Frank Gower, Grade 8 mathematics teacher at Colquitz Junior High.

He should know, he has done both.

For three years he tought sub-average students and now works with a class whose academic program is purposely enriched to match a high collective IQ.

"With below average students we must drill, drill, drill," he said, while with those of above average ability the methods and warning signs are more complex.

FAIL TO GRASP

Mr. Gower said that the two things which the teacher of above-average students must guard against at all costs are boredom, and the failure to completely grasp fundamentals.

The math teacher, who also teaches physical education at the school, said it is the student's superior reasoning power which takes him into fields without a full understanding of the basic principles which got him there.

CAN'T BE DONE

The task of retaining the interest of the superior intellect student is made more difficult by the fact that it cannot be done "by stealing from high school curriculums."

This would simply postpone the day when the curriculum would no longer offer a challenge, and hold the interest, of the student.

In his dual role teaching mathematics to top students and then dealing with them in the gymnasium and on the playing fields, Mr. Gower is prepared to explode an old myth.

DEFINITE FALLACY

"It is definitely a fallacy that the superior intellect student is a dull, bespectacled youngster unsuited to athletics. In fact, I have found that the best athletes come from among the brightest students."

Mr. Gower said he finds his work "extremely rewarding" and that "there is certainly no chance of me getting bored."
